Leaders: Julie Wright, Diane Sweeney Consulting; and school and district leaders from MCLA's Instructional Coaching Co-Op.

Instructional coaching can be the most effective professional development teachers experience. Coaching can change classroom practice, build a positive school and district learning culture, and significantly increase student achievement. But hiring coaches and putting them to work doesn't automatically yield these results. We'll use Diane Sweeney's student-centered coaching model and best practices from Maine administrators to identify the characteristics of effective support for instructional coaching.

Participants will:

1. Clarify the purposes of instructional coaching across the district.
2. Understand the principles of student-centered coaching.
3. Explore the roles and responsibilities of principals, coaches, and school and district administrators in building a culture of learning.
4. Use a team self-assessment framework to plan next steps.
